Dear Colleague: Proposed ABN AMRO merger and the corporate logo

Thursday, 21 June 2007

Dear Colleague

Although the subject of the corporate logo was discussed with the media (particularly in Amsterdam) a little while back, you will have seen the flurry of newspaper coverage about this over the last couple of days.

So this is a short letter to tell you what's happening.

As you think about this subject, you need to distinguish in your mind between the holding company and the operating companies. The holding company is the legal entity that will sit at the top of the enlarged Group pyramid, and is the company that will be listed on the London Stock Exchange. The operating companies are the companies in which we conduct our banking business now and in the future – for example, Barclays Bank PLC in the United Kingdom.

As you know, the name of the combined Barclays ABN AMRO enterprise (i.e. the holding company) will be Barclays PLC. In due course, we will decide how we will brand the new Barclays in the many countries around the world in which we and ABN AMRO do business. It's very clear, for example, that the name in which we will continue to do business in the United Kingdom will be Barclays Bank. Similarly, we will use the ABN AMRO name in the Netherlands.

As you know, in terms of logo, Barclays has an eagle and ABN AMRO has a shield. The holding company of the combined enterprise will have the shield as its logo. And then, just as in the case of the names or brands, we will decide on which logo to use, by geography and by business, in due course. In making these decisions (as in all things) we will be guided by what works best for our customers and our clients. The eagle is an important symbol of Barclays Bank operations in the UK, and my working assumption is that it will remain so.

It's perhaps an indication of the fact that the summer has begun, that this subject has commanded such attention in the press over the course of the last day or two. But I wanted you to know the facts.

John
