Following is an unofficial transcript of an interview with SandRidge Energy, Inc. CEO Tom L. Ward today on CNBC's Mad Money with Jim Cramer, which was televised on May 24, 2010.

Jim Cramer: Holy cow. The oil stocks have just gotten pounded as the price of crude has plummeted, but tonight we want to take a look at speculative oil and gas name that may have fallen too far and too fast. Talking about SandRidge Energy, SD for all you home gamers. Now, I recommended SandRidge on March 19th off of a mad mail question. Stock was then at $7.44, okay it's down 27% to $5.40, its 52 week low. So, mea culpa. I got it wrong, alright, and believe me I am beating myself up over it with the full cat o nine tails, self flagellation treatment. You can see the scars if I took my incredibly cheap Century 21 twenty twenty three dollar shirt off, but I will spare you the display just this once. I said SandRidge made sense, not just as an earnings story but possibly as a takeover target. Instead of being acquired, though, they went out and bought another company, Arena Resources, for $40.00 a share. Mostly stock-based deal. That put pressure on the stock along with the disappointing quarter SandRidge reported on May 6th. The analysts say disappointing. It's not necessarily my judgment, okay. With earnings coming in a penny per share when Wall Street was looking for 18 cents. The big decline in the price of oil hurt, so did some disappointing drilling in the western part of Texas. They have all combined to put this stock in a real house of pain, really more of a mansion of pain or maybe a fortress of pain. If you own this one you're probably feeling like you're living in the Chateaux Marquis de Sade. SandRidge deserved a haircut and maybe it deserved a total head shave, which I've been thinking about, but it got a beheading. I don't think it deserves to be down this much. Think about it, the price of oil is down 13% since I recommended the stock March 19th, $80 barrel to $70 barrel. Stock is down 27%, double the size of crude's decline. Plus, I think the Arena Resources acquisition, which will increase SandRidge's oil exposure relative to natural gas, taking it 48% oil to 57% oil, makes a lot of sense. I still like SandRidge's assets in west Texas, the Permian basin, Oklahoma. With nat gas going nowhere despite my best attempts to change that, the more oily the better. On the other hand, the company lowered its production guidance 2010 when it reported its latest quarter. Also, increased its finding cost by forecasts of 6%. Maybe we got SandRidge wrong once, but perhaps now it's come down enough to be worth buying. Some of these issues are going to be cleared up. I'm going to talk to Tom Ward. He's the terrific CEO of SandRidge. He's a brilliant guy also, co-founded Chesapeake Energy. I've known this guy for years and we're going to find out what's going on. Mr. Ward, welcome to Mad Money. How you doin'?

Tom L. Ward: Good to see you, thank you.

Cramer: Have a seat, have a seat. We know oil is down, but your company has really been punished for growing, basically, and for maybe missing a quarter and yet, you have a long history, you personally, have a long history of making money for your partners. So, where do we come down here for five bucks? What are we thinking?

Ward: Well, we have a very balanced company that is both oil and natural gas, so what we think is that we've taken the right disciplined management approach to be able to grow in either environment. With the acquisition of Arena Resources, we will be able to grow in either of these environments and we can have our growth in either oil or gas. In fact, we have over $3 billion worth of revenue hedged through 2012 on the oil side.

Cramer: Okay, so can you reveal where your hedges would be because oil down here at 70 still pretty good.

Ward: Sure, at $87 per barrel.

Cramer: So, you got it locked in.

Ward: Nearly $3 billion from 2010 to 2012.

Cramer: So, maybe people are upset for trimming the guidance here, but you did something very right that a lot of the investors are not aware of at all.

Ward: Sure. We moved from a natural gas company to an oil company. In fact, next year in 2011, we will have over 70% of our revenues will come from oil.

Cramer: I know this deal closes, what imminently?

Ward: Yes, June 8th.

Cramer: And you do not think you over paid in retrospect? You like this deal? You don't have any second thoughts, any buyer's remorse?

Ward: No, we love this deal because it was the one-two punch that allowed us to move into oil. Not only did we buy oil when we were a natural gas company. First we hedged our natural gas in 2008 through 2010. In fact, this year we will get $9.15 for our gas in 2010 and then we did the one-two punch of buying oil and hedging it. So we bought oil, made 70% of our revenues. And we're balanced oil or we can drill natural gas and we have $87 dollars in that hedged out through 2012.

Cramer: Okay, so, Tom, basically your balance sheet risks is that you don't have any debt come due for a while so it's minimal, right?

Ward: Our first debt is due in 2014. We have a $850 million dollar credit facility. We are in great shape.

Cramer: How about this, a lot of these analyst were upset about the West Texas Overthrust that you came up with what, look you're a wildcatter, you came up with something that was not a dry hole, I'm not going to call it a dry hole because it was not a dry hole. People were upset because you did not have something bigger out west because they're used to you hitting big.

Ward: Well, actually it was a great discovery, but there is no reason to continue to drill for natural gas today. We have 10 rigs running in our Piñon Field. We were projected to have 18 rigs running. But we decided to have that management discipline that we needed in order to back off of our drilling and there's where we missed our numbers for the first quarter. But we also spent less on our capex. So our growth is really tied to making the most we can with the smallest amount spent. So, minimizing capex to capture EBITDA.

Cramer: But why didn't you explain that more ahead that you would do that because the analysts seemed completely baffled and yet that is total common sense approach.

Ward: Well, I mean they shouldn't be. They shouldn't be baffled because we projected after the first of the year that we were going to move down our drilling in gas. So we've increased our oil drilling from 2 rigs to 14 rigs just in the first quarter. Our oil production is moving up tremendously.

Cramer: Absolutely, okay now there was this terrific presentation. I always urge people to go online. The RBS high yield conference this was May 13th. In it you have an interesting question. Simple macro oil theory on why oil is difficult to find companies focused on natural gas. Now, I look at this. And you ask the question why, why is BG, Devon, Exxon, Mitsui, Stat Oil, Total. I mean if you have got all this natural gas, when are you going to get a call from these guys?

Ward: Well, we have not only natural gas, but we are balanced on oil also.

Cramer: Right, but I'm saying natural gas. The foreign guys clearly believe in our natural gas story even though American guys don't, right, even our government doesn't?

Ward: Absolutely, and we are bullish long term natural gas. That's how come we kept our natural gas in the West Texas Overthrust and balanced it with oil in the Permian basin. And it's all conventional so we drill vertical wells in limestones and sandstones and it's all within 60 miles of our base in Fort Stockton, Texas.

Cramer: One last question. I know you're a money where your mouth is guy, is this going to be one of those situations where we look back and we say, wait a second we didn't like, but Tom Ward was in there buying the heck out of it?

Ward: Well, I'm extremely bullish on my company so we look at every opportunity to be able to say this is a buy.

Cramer: Alright. That's Tom Ward, Chairman, President, and CEO of SandRidge Energy. I am a believer and it does not seem that a lot of other people are but at $5.00 it's certainly cheaper and better than it was at $7.00. After the break, I'll try to make you even more money. Thank you, Tom. It's good to see you.
