Portfolio Review

The Taiwan Stock Exchange Index (TAIEX) fell sharply in April, declining 6.96% in US dollar terms. Fears of a reversal of the economic cycle emerged, as the world's two growth engines, the United States and China, seemed likely to start slowing down in coming months. China has started tightening monetary policies to slow its overheated economy, and U.S. interest rate increases are expected in August after recent strong economic performance. Global equity markets were influenced by these developments and a period of consolidation appears to be underway.

Regarding sector performance, the cyclical sectors performed poorly in April as concerns mounted regarding the strength of current economic cycle. The prospect of a slowing Chinese economy dampened investors' appetite for China-related stocks. Domestic consumption-related sectors were also hurt due to rich valuations and rising political tensions ahead of the presidential election vote recount scheduled for May. Within the technology sector, however, there were certain industries delivering good performance in April, specifically in handset and display areas.

In April, the Fund declined 7.53% in US dollar terms and underperformed the TAIEX, partially based on our focus on cyclical sectors. Looking ahead, we expect the market to bottom out after the recent selling pressure and profit taking. Although our top-down view of the market has turned more cautious for the near term, we still expect good potential for the market based on ample liquidity and attractive valuations. The market correction during March and April has provided a good opportunity for bottom up stock picking and we intend to invest accordingly.
