Letter from the President

Dear Valued Hirsch Customer/Partner:

I am pleased to share with you the news that Hirsch Electronics has entered into a definitive agreement to merge with SCM Microsystems, a leading, publically-traded supplier of smart card readers and other smart chip-enabled technologies. Combined, the new company will create a powerhouse enterprise offering converged solutions for physical and logical security.

The need for greater physical (e.g., building) and logical (e.g., PC/network) security as well as more powerful tools for risk mitigation and compliance has never been more apparent. Both Hirsch and SCM, in listening to and meeting the needs of our customers, recognized the value and power in combining our respective expertise and resources. As a single company with global reach, we can offer you a broader range and more integrated set of identity and access solutions from the door to the desktop, supporting virtually all types of credential from code to biometric to contact and contactless smart cards for both physical and logical access. For these reasons and others, we believe the combined company will be a more valuable partner to you.

Prior to the completion of the transaction, estimated to be in the first half of 2009, Hirsch and SCM will continue to operate in a business as usual posture as two separate, independent companies. Customers and partners will enjoy the same high level of sales and sales support, ordering, technical support, customer service, production, credit and shipping as before the announcement of the merger. Any agreements Hirsch has in place with customers and partners continue as they existed prior to the announcement. The Hirsch personnel with whom you conduct business remain the same.

After the closing of the transaction, Hirsch products and services will continue to be marketed, sold and supported by Hirsch Electronics under the established Hirsch brand names. And the combined company will have the opportunity to leverage Hirsch's traditional strengths in physical access control, intrusion detection, video surveillance and biometrics, with SCM's substantial expertise in contact and contactless smart cards, silicon and chip set design, and cryptography. The combined company will have the opportunity to produce highly integrated security products and services that merge physical security with secure computer log-on and other smart chip-enabled applications bringing convergence to reality.

Please refer to the press release announcement for further details. During this interim period, prior to the transaction's closing, Hirsch must abide by the rules governing mergers and acquisitions for public corporations. Thus, your Hirsch representative will likely direct inquiries about the merger to our corporate marketing department (marketing@hirschelectronics.com).

In closing, let me reiterate how excited I am to share this information with you. We have come to know the SCM personnel during our negotiations, and they value the same integrity and business ethics that have made Hirsch a trusted partner to your company and to you. I believe this merger aligns exceptionally well with our company culture and vision, the market trends and the desires expressed by our customers and partners.

Best regards,
Larry Midland
President
Hirsch Electronics
