Lam Research bids $10.6B for KLA-Tencor, creating chip giant

Oct. 21, 2015 7:25 AM EDT

NEW YORK (AP) Lam Research Corp. is buying KLA-Tencor Corp. for about $10.6 billion, creating a huge player in the semiconductor sector that will rival Applied Materials Inc.

The combined company, to be called Lam Research Corp., will have a market capitalization of around $19 billion, about equal to that of Applied Materials, and says it will serve 42 percent of the wafer fabrication equipment market when the deal closes in the middle of next year.

The offer, for $67.02 per share, marks a 24 percent premium to the closing price for KLA-Tencor Corp. on Tuesday. Lam says it will book $250 million in annualized savings within two years.

The buyout was announced during a round of heightened acquisition activity in the semiconductor sector. Western Digital Corp. is reportedly in talks to buy SanDisk Corp. Similar media reports have said SanDisk was in talks with Micron Technology Inc.

Last week, Dell said it is buying data storage company EMC Corp. for $67 billion, marking the largest deal ever between two technology companies, eclipsing Avago Technologies' proposed $37 billion acquisition of rival chipmaker Broadcom announced five months ago.

Shares of KLA-Tencor jumped $9.99, or 18.6 percent, to $63.85 in premarket trading while Lam Research shares slipped $1.01, or 1.4 percent, to $69.02. Both companies are based in California.

Two Silicon Valley chip-equipment companies tying the knot in $10.6 billion deal

Lam Research Corp. has agreed to buy KLA-Tencor Corp. for $10.6 billion in the latest of a frenzy of deals reshaping Silicon Valley's semiconductor industry.

The amount Fremont-based Lam (NASDAQ:LRCX) is paying values Milpitas-based KLA-Tencor (NASDAQ:KLAC) stock around 24 percent above its Tuesday closing price of $53.86.

The deal comes in a year when semiconductor companies have announced more than $130 billion in mergers and acquisitions, as the industry tries to cut costs through consolidation. This year's total has more than tripled the $37.7 billion in chip-sector deals for all of last year.

Lam, led by Chief Executive Martin Anstice, agreed to pay $67.02 a share in cash and stock for KLA-Tencor, which is led by CEO Rick Wallace.

KLA-Tencor shareholders are expected to own 32 percent of the combined company.

The merged company, to be led by Anstice, is expected to have a 42 percent market share in the wafer fabrication equipment market and have $8.7 billion in annual revenue.

The companies said they expect to find $250 million in annualized cost savings within 18 to 24 months of the deal closing.

Lam Chairman Steve Newberry will continue in that role. Two KLA-Tencor board members are expected to join the new board once the deal is completed, which is expected around the middle of next year.

KLA-Tencor employs 5,880. Lam employs 7,300.
